Construction-defects reform bill dies in Colorado Legislature

Apr 28, 2015, 6:51am MDT

Construction-defects reform is dead.

A two-year effort in the Colorado Legislature to jump-start stalled condominium construction fell Monday on party lines in a state House of Representatives committee.

Senate Bill 177 -- an idea of one senator which had gained the backing of a 55-organization business/nonprofit coalition -- died because backers could not convince six Democrats that increasing the difficulty in filing a class-action defects lawsuit also would increase the portfolio of affordable housing in the Denver area.

A hearing on Senate Bill 177 lasted five hours and involved the testimony of 41 witnesses. But the bill truly died about two-thirds of the way through the session when the swing vote on the House State, Veterans and Military Affairs Committee — Democratic Rep. Joe Salazar of Thornton — said he could see no guarantees that the bill would increase affordable housing, and that would hurt some homeowners.

"This tilts access to justice primarily toward developers and builders at the sake of owners," Salazar said after listening to the similar words of a homeowners-association attorney. "And that's a pretty big deal."

SB 177 backers said after the hearing that they were disappointed that the bill could not get over the hump in what is known as the "kill committee," especially knowing that it had the votes to pass easily on the House floor had it made it there.

But they also said they expect the battle over defects lawsuits to shift now to a growing number of Colorado cities willing to tackle the issue in lieu of state-government action, and they say they expect that the measure could be back in the Legislature in coming years if popular support for the effort continues to blossom.

“You saw a big coalition get bigger. It’s going to continue to grow and grow,” said House Minority Leader Brian DelGrosso, R-Loveland, who sponsored the measure in the House with state Rep. Jonathan Singer, D-Longmont. “The only opposition was trial lawyers, and I think people will see that.”

SB 177 sought to cut down on the ability of small groups of condominium owners to file class-action defects lawsuits over construction defects. Many developers blame the ease of filing such suits for the shortage of new condo construction in a state where demand for housing is soaring.

Limiting lawsuits

The measure would have required a majority of condo owners in a unit — rather than just a majority of homeowners association board members — to vote to file a lawsuit, and it would ban HOAs from unilaterally striking clauses in their contracts that require disputes go to mediation or arbitration.

DelGrosso framed the bill as one that was needed to create more affordable housing — even if, as opponents said, it did not address any incentives to build more such housing directly.

Limiting lawsuits would make fewer builders reluctant to put up condominiums, and it would allow those who do develop them to do so at a price where they don’t have to add the likely cost of legal action to their costs, he said.

“I cannot guarantee” more affordable condos will go up because of the bill, DelGrosso told the committee, answering a question that was asked repeatedly of him and supporters. “But what I can guarantee is that if we don’t change the laws, none are going to be built.”

Supporters noted that only 4 percent of the new housing stock in Colorado last year was condominiums. They argued that the dearth of lower-priced owner-occupied housing was keeping young professionals from becoming homeowners and was culpable in the skyrocketing cost of apartment rentals that has financially strapped many families.

And many of those same supporters, who rallied in the Capitol for the bill before the hearing, noted that three cities — Lakewood, Lone Tree and Littleton — have passed or are in the process of passing local defects-reform laws to do the same thing as SB 177.

Lakewood Mayor Bob Murphy said he is working with a developer who is planning to build a 188-condominium unit specifically because of his city’s laws, though he did not know how affordable they would be.

But opponents continued to return to one central theme: Nothing good would come from a bill whose primary purpose was to limit the rights of certain homeowners to take disputes with builders to courts.
Most of the testimony against SB 177 came either from homeowners-association board members or their attorneys who said they have had to sue builders in order to get construction defects fixed and did not want other HOAs to lose the ability to do that.

Molly Foley-Healy, an attorney with the Community Associations Institute, said the bill stacked the deck for developers and against condominium owners. Homeowner apathy virtually guarantees that 51 percent of condo owners will never vote to proceed with a lawsuit, and declaration clauses in most contracts allow the builders to pick the arbitrators if they can’t agree with homeowners on a choice, giving them a leg up in what can be as expensive a judicial process as court proceedings, she said.

“This bill is really window dressing for the destruction of homeowners’ rights,” Foley-Healy said. “This has to stop.”

'Clueless'

Committee opponents threw pointed questions at bill backers.

Rep. Max Tyler, D-Lakewood, asked an attorney for the Homeownership Opportunity Alliance — the coalition of economic developers, metro-area mayors, business groups and affordable-housing advocates who had pushed SB 177 through the Senate earlier this month with bipartisan support — if the condo owners who now can vote to remove mandatory-arbitration provisions from their contracts with builders were “clueless.”

Attorney Amy Hansen said that while some homeowners are very aware of the magnitude of changes, others have the changes presented to them as administrative amendments, not knowing that the filing of a class-action lawsuit can strip them of their ability to sell their home to anyone who needs a loan to buy it.

For opponents, some of the key testimony seemed came from Boulder economist Patricia Pacey, who did a study for construction-defects reform opponents.

That study stated that a lack of demand — rather than a lack of product — was driving down the number of condos for young professionals. Those millennial workers make comparatively less than their counterparts 10 years ago and are being asked to make larger down payments.

Salazar gave her a thumbs-up at the end of her testimony.

Not everyone agree with the research by Pacey, who said that most other cities resembled Denver’s for their lack of new condos.

Stefka Fanchi, executive director of Habitat for Humanity Colorado, said condos make up 25 percent of the new housing market in other big cities — a number first put forward by a 2013 Denver Council of Regional Governments study.

And Gene Lucero, a Denver real estate agent, said that local figures speak to the demand for condos. The number of pending or under-contract condos in the Denver area rose 34 percent year-over-year in 2014, and the average sales price jumped 13 percent, he said.
Tyler asked Lucero why anyone would build condos when they can get $2,000 a month in rent for a unit of the same size in Denver’s housing market.

“Believe it or not, there are some people who are altruistic and are interested in affordable housing,” Lucero responded.

Unrelated areas

Discussions veered to a number of areas not directly related to SB 177 as well.

Some committee members asked why local construction inspectors didn’t get sued like builders. Engineer Edward Fronapfel and homeowners’ attorney Jesse Witt both said that inspectors are held to ensuring a “D-minus” construction standard, and SB 177 would not change that.

Tyler asked several witnesses if they felt that increased inspections or certification of quality control might do more to prevent lawsuits. In what is likely not a coincidence, he and Rep. Tracy Kraft-Tharp, D-Arvada, introduced House Bill 1385 on Monday to create a voluntary quality-control certification process for condo developments.

Michael Gifford, president of Associated General Contractors of Colorado, responded that increased quality control could help cut down on some lawsuits but couldn’t fend off the myriad legal actions being filed without merit.

“Yet the lawsuits happen on projects that don’t have a construction defect,” Gifford said.

With the main construction-defects effort done for this year, House committees will take up bills later this week that seek to increase tax credits and grant funding for affordable housing, as well as Tyler’s quality-control bill.

A fourth potential bill that would have allowed plaintiffs in defects suits to collect pre-judgment interest is unlikely to be introduced, he said.

Littleton passes construction-defects ordinance

Posted Wednesday, May 6, 2015 8:16 pm

By Jennifer Smith

Just days after state-level legislation died in a House committee, Littleton became the third Colorado city to take the construction-defects matter into its own hands.

"We are not advocates of shoddy construction or shoddy property management," said Mayor Phil Cemanec. "We're advocating for conversations."

Mike Braaten, deputy city manager, explained that the city's new law, passed May 5, is similar to ones enacted in Lakewood and Lone Tree, but differs from what was proposed in the state Legislature in two main ways.

First, it gives the builder the absolute right to try to repair any construction defects, so that a property owner or homeowners' association can't just go straight to court.

"But if, in good faith, the repairs do not resolve the conflict, the claimant may proceed with action," Braaten said.

Secondly, it requires an HOA to get the consent of the majority of property owners it governs before initiating a suit on behalf of all of them, some of whom might not be experiencing any problems.

"It shuts down the ability of every property owner to exercise their property rights, because the lawsuit throws a cloud over the title," said Stew Meagher, Littleton resident and a member of the South Metro Denver Realtor Association.

Twelve people spoke during the public hearing, evenly divided between for and against. Most in the "anti" camp live outside the city, while at least three of those in favor are Littleton residents.

But it was council's vote that mattered, and six of the seven members agreed that passing the ordinance was necessary to fill a vast void in the city's housing market: affordable, for-sale, multifamily homes. Cemanec acknowledges there's still no guarantee on the "affordable" part, however.

"But absent this, there is a guarantee we will not have affordable housing," he said.

Whether for young couples starting out or seniors looking to downsize, most agree options are lacking.

According to data from SMDRA, the number of active listings for townhouses and condominiums has dropped by more than half in Littleton since this time last year, from 72 to 31. At the same time, the average sales price has gone up from about $205,000 to $238,500. There are currently 184 such units that have been approved, but only two have been built and another two are under construction.
"When someone purchases a home for the first time in a community such as Littleton, they are far more likely to establish roots here," said Littleton resident Kay Watson, speaking on behalf of SMDRA in her role as a board director. "They are vested. They pay property tax and they care about how it is spent in our parks and in our schools. They become active, stable members of our community."

Councilmember Jerry Valdes was the lone "no" vote.

"I don't think this ordinance does anything to reduce risk for the homeowner, and I don't think it does anything to reduce risk for the builder," he said. "I think we're getting ahead of ourselves. I think we're looking for trouble for ourselves. I want to see it play out at the state. I don't think we're ready to take this on ourselves. ... It's market driven."

Councilmember Bruce Stahlman countered that in this case, the market has been perverted by a 2007 state law that swung too far to the side of the homeowners.

"The argument that favors the status quo does not recognize that in Littleton, the status quo is not working," he said.

Critics of the 2007 law say it caused builders' insurance rates to skyrocket to more than 50 percent higher than surrounding states, in some cases, effectively shutting down the for-sale market in favor of rentals. About 40 percent of Littleton residents rent, a number that's stayed fairly stable for the last 10 years, said Braaten.

There was some discussion among councilmembers about tweaking the mediation process between builder and homeowner, but in the end, the majority decided it was important to pass what they had before them and ask staff to come back with modifications.

"I'd love it to be perfect, but maybe we can't get it perfect," said Councilmember Peggy Cole.

RE: Logan Simpson Design Contract Addendum

At the request of the City Manager and City Council, staff has requested Logan Simpson Design, our Comprehensive Plan consultants, to provide additional outreach directly to the neighborhood areas. This outreach will insure that the community has adequate opportunity to engage in the comprehensive plan process and provide valuable input with respect to the characterization of the neighborhood areas and subsequent neighborhood strategy and implementation development. To that end staff and consultants have scheduled six additional community as follows:

Wednesday July 8, 2015
Romans Park, 5 pm – 7 pm
Belleview Park, 5 pm – 7 pm

Saturday July 11, 2015
Bates Logan Park, 10 am – 12 pm
Centennial Park, 10 am – 12 pm
Duncan Park, 1 pm – 3 pm
Baker Park, 1 pm – 3 pm

The six additional community engagement events, the two additional consultant team neighborhood area characterization meetings with the Planning and Zoning Commission and the three additional strategies and implementation meetings (two with the Planning and Zoning Commission and one with City Council) were not part of the original Englewood Forward Comprehensive Plan Update scope of services.

To accomplish these additional tasks, Logan Simpson Design proposed a modification of the original scope of services that includes $6,378 for the six community events, $1,512 for project management due to the expanded project schedule and $8,266 for the five additional consultant team meetings; three with the Planning and Zoning Commission and two with City Council. These activities will increase the original $150,000 contract by $16,156. Funding for the amendment to the consultant agreement is available within the 2015 Community Development budget.

Staff and consultants have also initiated public notification and advertising of these events.
